REAL SOLDIERS ARE MADE IN THE FIELD

Practice March Of Cavalry Squadron Teaches A Lesson

By LAURENCE REDINGTON.

A solid wall of dust reared itself between the glistening rows of canes, and then feathered off over the field on the wings of an indolent breeze. Out from behind the gray curtain came a troop of cavalry at the trot, the hoofbeats of the chargers deadened by the soft going, a silent, dust-laden outfit of men and mounts, lacking the proverbial clink of accoutrements and glitter of burnished metal. Behind the first troop rode a second, and behind that another and another, four in all.

The leading troop checked to the walk and the dust cloud settled and disappeared as the column came onto hard ground and swung by the Wai-alea plantation store, to the shrill chatter of half a hundred Japanese men, women and children, mostly children, who crowded to the roadside to watch the soldiers go by. Only for a moment, however, was Oriental curiosity aroused, for marching men, armed or unarmed, are a common sight on the western end of Oahu. And they have this tale.

At Schofield Barracks, planted on the highlands of Lihouea, are nearly 3000 of Uncle Sam's boys in khaki. So the garrison will number 10,000, and yet, while Honolulu knows in a vague way that there are many soldiers here and more to come, the constant reminder of men marching in derision is lacking with the city folk. The outlying districts get many a sight of cavalry, infantry and artillery for one arm of the service or another, in various units of organization, in nearly always on practice march or maneuver outside the limits of the big reservation.

It is on these practice marches that the real soldier is made. In garrison he learns to drill and shoot and ride, but in the field he gets the solid soldiering driven in by actual experience. He learns to take care of himself and his horse, if he is of the mounted service. If he is a foot soldier he learns to take care of his feet, which at the end of a long hike are about the most painful reminders of lack of the proper precautions that can be imagined.

In the summer and fall the various organizations at Schofield go on practice marches of four to six days duration, first by troop, company or battery, then by squadron or battalion, and last by regiment. This year the season of field instruction is to close with a ten-day maneuver campaign, in which all troops on Oahu will engage, but this will not come until late in October, and at present the practice marches are going merrily along.

Tuesday to Friday of this week inclusive, the third squadron of the Fifth Cavalry was out on its squadron march, and for part of the time in the field the writer accompanied the command. Looking at the march from the broader angle, it was far more impressive than any reviews, inspections, or drills that one might see at Schofield Barracks, for it showed the real life of soldiering; the mobility of troops without the excitement of real warfare to set the miles at naught.

Also, it showed the slashing, dashing cavalryman in a new light. It showed him light-hearted as a schoolboy at getting away from garrison routine, ready to make play out of work, and at the same time self-reliant and efficient from reveille to taps. The Real Cavalry.

If you want to get at the meat of things military, consult a soldier, a sergeant, or a commissioned officer. The commissioned officer is often out of touch with the men's point of view, and the young private is very apt to be a bundle of egotism and intolerance. But the old sergeant sees the life from all angles, and is apt to have a pretty keen insight into things, not as they ought to be but as they are.

Tuesday night the squadron marched from Lihouea to Mokuia, which is three stations west of Haleiwa, on the sea shore. Troops I, K, L and M had their "pup" tents pitched, their picket line settled, the officers' and cook tents up, and a generally modish camp laid out long before sundown, and in plenty of time to allow the men the luxury of a dip in the surf to wash away the stains of travel.

It was there that I sought out the Old Sergeant (he gets his name in caps now that he has become a concrete personage) who, seated on a log of driftwood, exhaled clouds of mosquito annihilating smoke from a short brier pipe with a cracked mouth.

CAVALRYMEN AT WORK AND AT PLAY

Two snapshots, taken on the practice march of the third squadron of the Fifth Cavalry last week, show men and horses enjoying the unusual luxury of a sea bath. The other picture was taken ten minutes after the command halted at Waialea, and shows with what despatch the cavalrymen can pitch their "pup" tents and make a comfortable camp.

They told me all about practice marches.

Men Like Them. "They're all right, these marches," said the O. S. "They teach the recruits a lot that they think they know but don't, and they break the routine of post life for everybody. About half the men in my troop had never been out in the field until the troop practice march that came before this. They were green as grass, but if the non coms jump them hard enough, and they keep their eyes open, they soon learn how to take care of themselves and their horses, and not make nuisances of themselves."

"Funny, but you don't hear much kicking from any one on these marches. No matter how much dust a man swallows, or how tired he gets sitting in the saddle when his hot, he likes getting away from the past. And he likes the swimming best of all. Schofield would be all right if it was near the ocean, but here we are in the middle of an island in the middle of the Pacific Ocean, with no chance of getting a swim unless we come on some march like this to the coast. The horses like the swimming too. Tomorrow at Waialea you'll see them get their turn at a real bath."

Army is Changed. "The army isn't like it used to be, by a long way. Before the Spanish war it was made up of professional soldiers, and mighty good ones they were too. Then, after the war, there were a certain proportion of the volunteers who liked the life and decided to stay in. They were a good lot of men too, but most of them by this time are in the Philippines, getting their double time to help them along toward retirement. At least, that's what they were doing until congress cut the double time off. Now most of the recruits we get are either boys from the farm, or city youngsters who've got the idea that they can get a living without working if they enlist. They get over this in short order, but they get some rude shocks doing it. The cavalry recruits get 37 days instruction before they're sent out to us, but they don't really begin to know the game until they get out in the field like this. Soldiering is a good game, but it's got to be played according to the rules. I don't know what's going to happen to the army now that they've got this seven year enlistment. Personally I think we'd have got better men if the active term had been cut to two years, instead of raised to four, with the reserve time at three years."

Horses Have Swim. Wednesday the squadron marched to Waialea, where the men swam their horses just as my friend the O. S. said, and as the snapshots which I made prove. This, for the enlisted men of the command, and probably for the horses if their opinion could be heard, proved the best fun of the whole march. Thursday a twenty-mile swing to Kahuku and return, and Friday the long march back to Lihouea, completed the practice.

The squadron was commanded on the march by Captain Hall, of M troop, who is the senior in the absence of Major McClure. Captain Haight and I troop, K was commanded by Lieutenant Christy, L by Captain Dixon, while Lieutenant Hanson was second in command of M troop, and found time to act as a very resourceful and efficient commissary officer. By this list it is to be seen that the Fifth is very short on officers. Horses are another scarcity, men of every troop of the squadron having to be left at home because there weren't enough mounts to go round.

Whistling, according to some physicians, will do a great deal toward making the person robust and strong.

A hot water bath in which has been dissolved about two ounces of coarse salt will cure tired, swollen feet.
